EDF Increases Production Capacity

The island's electricity will be augmented at the EDF plant in Public with the installation of two new 8 MW motors. The maximum per household will continue to be monitored.

"Two new eight megawatt motors will be installed to meet the rising demand," explains Yvan Delmas, regional director for the EDF Archipel Guadeloupe. However, for technical reasons, the extent of the plant's electric production is never fully available. On the other hand, maintenance of the motors on a regular basis guarantees their performance. Electricity per household will be limited to 6KW (or 6000 watts) in spite of the increase of EDF's capacity for the island, which will go from 23.1 megawatts to 39.7 MW.

St Barth: A Self-Contained System

Managing its electric system is a large challenge for a small island like St Barth, which produces all of its energy at the plant in Public. The project, "Iles du Nord," which called for an interconnection via cable between St Barth, the French and Dutch sides of Saint Martin, and Anguilla was refused by Saint Barth's territorial council, making it imperative to find an alternative means to increase electric energy due to an increase in power consumption. The increase has been fairly steady for the past years (an average of +4.8% per year between 2000 and

Less Polluting

The work extending the EDF plant will begin this month. "The future plant will be more modern and less polluting," adds Delmas. But, "The increase in production capacity should not be synonymous with an increase in consumption," insists Bruno Magras, president of Saint Barth's Territorial Council,

International Property Owners Meeting

Over 40 people attended the January 20 meeting of the St Barth International Property Owners Association held at Santa Fe restaurant, with Bruno Magras, president of the island's territorial council, as special guest. Called to order by association president Larry O'Donnell, the meeting addressed various issues of interest to homeowners and residents. Magras noted he was “happy that people from outside have an interest in the island and what's going on.” In assessing the healthy financial status of the island, he pointed out that no new taxes will be added in 2011, and that a budget surplus of 39 million euros, built up over past years through solid financial management, was being used for projects, such as repaving the roads and building the new stone walls to the building of an old age home and new sewers in Gustavia. “The only tax we are considering,” he said, “would be taxing EDF and France Telecom to encourage them to put their wires underground, which we hope would cost less than the tax.” Magras also mentioned that the European Council in Brussels accepted the island's request to become a PTOM (Peripheral Overseas Territory) as of January 2012.

Questions from the floor ranged from utilities—can the island produce enough water and electricity (see page 2)—to gambling: “There is no more talk of a casino in Gustavia,” confirmed Magras. “The French minister indicated there would be no permit for a casino issued in Saint Barth. A private club was suggested but is not going forward now.” Another question was about green zones on the island. Magras discussed the implementation of a new land use map, explaining that new zones have been opened but that the island now has full control over the issuing of building permits, which was not the case in the past. “We are talking about buying some land so that we can sell small parcels of 400 to 500 sq meters to young people who want to build a house in the future faced with rising land costs,” the president explained. “The right to build on the island is the same for everyone, it depends on the location.”

The idea of a hotel project in Saline was broached as well as the ecological disaster and abandoned hotel project in Grand Cul de Sac. Magras insisted that as long as he was in power the hotel in Saline would not be built and that in any case a petition was signed by 1200 people to stop it. As for Cul de Sac: “The property is owned by a hedge fund from Britain and Switzerland who are asking 65M€ for it,” Magras pointed out. “It is my understanding that people are trying to negotiating with the bank to buy it for a lesser amount.”

In stressing that the island's beaches are all public, Magras noted that the Collectivity is paying to bring sand from behind the coral reef onto the beach in St Jean based on the advice of the scientists. “Hurricane Louis caused water to flood the houses along St. Jean beach; therefore many walls were built to stop this from happening again. In turn the walls have created an erosion of the beaches,” he points out. The final question: Will Magras run in the island's 2012 elections? A question he is not ready to answer!

SEBASTIAN SCHILDT RETURNS TO SAINT BARTH

I refer to Sebastian Schildt as Sweden's leading "rock star," as he has a way with precious stones, turning them into the most fabulous rings, earrings, and pendants. This charming Swedish silversmith and jeweller was the first artist to be showcased at the Swedish Design Centre in Saint Barth (swedishdesigncentre.com) in December 2007, one month after the center opened. He has returned every year since, and is back again with a reception in his honor on Friday, January 28 at the Design Centre's new location in Gustavia.

"These colors are different from what I would make for Sweden," he says, indicating the pink conch necklaces made with Saint Barth in mind. "These look good with tanned skin, so they are perfect for the Caribbean. The same is true for the gold pearls."

Schildt's collections feature jewels as well as finely made objects in sterling silver: sparkling strands of rubies, emeralds, and aquamarines with diamond-accented pendants, as well as a necklace and matching earrings with golden pearls from Indonesia and diamond encrusted stars. Necklaces of queen conch cultured in The Bahamas have pink squares carefully cut to fit smoothly together, accented with coordinated pendants.

As for the stones, Schildt likes any stone as long as it's perfect. "It's about reflecting light," he says. "If a stone is not cut properly it doesn't reflect light and it's not beautiful." But as he said the first time we met, "the most interesting thing about any piece of my jewelry is the woman who wears it."

Saint Barth Essentiel Needs Your Help

Protection of the island's biodiversity is a major issue for Saint Barthélemy. If its insularity is synonymous with an exceptional biological diversity, it also points to a serious fragility whose survival depends on the actions of public decision makers.

Many different species on the island are endemic to the West Indies or Saint Barthélemy, such as certain cactus and the local Saint Barthélemy "pear" tree. Every time a species becomes extinct represents an important loss for global biodiversity. That's why it's essential for Saint Barthélemy to protect its natural heritage.

Aware that the only means to efficient action is an awareness of the situation, the non-profit association, St Barth Essentiel, is launching an ambitious project: bringing in experts to do an inventory of all the species of fauna found on the island. This will serve as a first step in effective preservation of species emblematic to the island, species that add to the beauty of our landscapes and to the reputation of the island.

gest measures of protection for certain species and limit the proliferation of certain invasive species;

- Creating reports, articles, books, maps, and any other documents that can help promote awareness of the state of global biodiversity;
- Creating a space for information collected in the field as well as scientific materials needed for research. This would be the first step in the creation of the Saint Barthélemy Natural History Museum.
- Informing the International Union for Conservation of Nature (IUCN) of the results of the inventories and request that certain endemic species be placed on the Red List of Threatened Species.

Guest scientists include botanist Claude Sastre, honorary professor at the National Natural History Museum, February 11-March 5, 2011, and later in 2011: Anne Breuil, Michel Breuil, Léonide Célini...

St Barth Essentiel needs your help to realize this project, from homes where these scientists can stay as well as vehicles so they can get around the island, to feeding them while they are here. St Barth Essentiel is also paying for the airplane tickets for these guests from Paris-St Barth.

The project comprises:

- A look at the existing inventories of Saint Barth's flora and fauna;
- Updating these inventories to make new, more complete versions;
- Focusing on species specific to Saint Barth, their rarity and risk of extinction;
- Examining the consequences the invasive species have on the local biodiversity;
- Field observation to sug-

If you can offer any help for this important inventory project, please send an email to the association at sbarthessentiel@yahoo.fr, or call Helene Bernier at 06 90 63 46 09.

Yvon Magras, Captain of the Voyager

«I saw the first whale of the season...»

Last Thursday, I saw the first whale of the season," notes Yvon Magras, captain of the Voyager, one of the daily ferry services between Saint Martin and Saint Barth, who always enjoys catching sight of the migrating humpback whales.

For 30 years he has been a seafarer, and every year at the same time he sees whales and dolphins as he plies the ocean. These marine mammals are often seen frolicking in the open seas between Anguilla and the Northern islands, a spot they seem to particularly enjoy. Between January and

June, it is not unusual to see them between Pinel and Tintamarre, for example. "Ten years ago there were a lot more of them, I'd see as many as seven whales at the same time," recalls Magras.

NOTICE FOR ALL CAPTAINS

All paperwork for boats entering and leaving the Port of Gustavia can now be completed on the Internet at the following address: <http://clairance.portdegustavia.com> This paperwork of clearance to enter or leave the port must be done by the captain or the second-in-command once the boat has arrived or via the Internet, 24 hours in advance.

Payment can be made in Euros (cash or checks) or by credit card (VISA or MASTER CARD) before the boat leaves the port, or at any time during its stay as requested by the port authorities.

All maneuvers in the port zone must receive authorization from the port via VHF Channel 12. Boats may leave the dock between 7am and 3:30pm and arrivals are between 7:30am and 5:30pm.

Please note that after 5:30pm, if any boats have not returned to the dock, berths will be reassigned.
